

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I have a lot of people to thank for their support throughout the writing of this book. I begin with Professor Peter J. Paris, who approached me about the project while he was serving as visiting professor at Boston University School of Theology from 2013 to 2015. At first, I was reluctant because of other outstanding projects that were staring me down, but no one can say no to Peter, with the exception of Adrienne, his beloved wife. He has been a colleague over the years and a dear friend who “sticketh closer than a brother.” As the series editor, Peter read the manuscript several times and offered excellent advice, which is reflected in these pages. Jennifer Hammer, my editor at New York University Press, has been a constant guide, prodder, encourager, and critic who inspired and challenged me to give a bit more and to find my voice. I owe her an incredible debt of gratitude.

Dean Mary Elizabeth Moore has been a gentle but enthusiastic supporter of my work since coming to Boston University School of Theology in the fall of 2010. I am thankful to her and all my colleagues at the School of Theology. I extend special thanks to Professors Courtney Goto, Pamela Lightsey, and Nimi Wariboko, who advised me or made contributions to my thinking at important junctures in my writing. The teaching fellows Onaje X. Woodbine, Kathryn House, and Derrick Muwina and my research assistant Julian Cook have done much of the nitty-gritty, behind-the-scenes work of finding correct citations and obscurely published documents that hopefully have added to the density and scope of the argument found in this text. I am also grateful to have a son who has chosen a scholarly path. Clinton R. Fluker has listened to and read portions of the book, especially chapter 7, and has offered observations that have kept me on the straight and narrow of black aesthetics and culture. Other scholars whom I acknowledge throughout have provided thoughtful commentary in places where I was treading on shallow ground, especially Herbert Marbury, associate professor of Hebrew Bible at Vanderbilt University; and Shively Smith, assistant professor of New Testament at Wesley Theological Seminary.

The idea for The Ground Has Shifted has been germinating for some time, but without the fellowship of colleagues and collaborators, it would not have seen the light of day. My good friend R. Drew Smith, professor of urban ministry at Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, invited me to co-keynote with Alan Boesak at a conference sponsored by the Transnational Roundtable on Religion, Race and Ethnicity in Johannesburg, South Africa, in 2011. The lecture was subsequently published as “Shape-Shifting: Cultural Hauntings, Contested Post-Racialism, the Black Church and Theological Imagination” in Contesting Post-Racialism: Conflicted Churches in the United States and South Africa, edited by R. Drew Smith, William Ackah, Anthony Reddie, and Rothney Tshaka (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2015). The following year, 2012, the same organization invited me to keynote at the Birbeck College of London University, where the early seeds of my thinking on the Pentecostal symbolism of “a scattered and scattering peoples” were presented. In February 2014, I was invited to serve as the Distinguished Lecturer for the Paul Allen Lecture Series at McCormick Theological Seminary in Chicago. I presented two lectures that find form in the present text: “Cultural Asylums and the Jungles Planted in Them: The Exilic Condition of African American Males in a Post-Industrial, Post-Modern World” and “Tools of the Spirit: Identity, Otherness, and Human Flourishing and the Exilic Condition of African American Males.” I am indebted to these individuals and institutions and so many others who have exhorted, reproved, and rebuked my feeble attempts presented in this book. I bring what I have done back to all of you as an offering, a debt paid to you and to so many ancestors who crowd these pages.

I am also deeply indebted to Silvia Glick, managing editor of the Howard Thurman Papers Project, for her editing of the manuscript. Her careful eye and uncompromising standards have guided me throughout the writing and final production of the book. I am the senior editor and director of the Howard Thurman Papers Project at Boston University, and since I've lived with this work for over twenty years, readers should not be surprised that Howard Thurman speaks often in this text. I have not attempted to quiet him down—he deserves our hearing.

Finally, I have been extraordinarily blessed to have a life companion, Sharon Watson Fluker, who for thirty-five years has shared in my every success and has supported me in my every failure. In my eyes, she continues to be the wisest and most beautiful of all God's creations.
